

Migraine - The Nasty Troll in My Head, Of a life with lightning in the head

You have to want it, the alternative practitioner states. I would consult an osteopath, the friend recommends. Just about everyone seems to know how to treat a migraine appropriately. This is precisely what Kalinka Nauer experiences on her search for the right physician and therapist. She meets attractive chiropractors, comes across a pupil diagnostic specialist who sees evil things in her eyes, and visits neurologists who don't have much to offer than to hand out cephalgia calendars. Occasionally Kalinka wonders what is worse, the migraine or the good advice of her fellow men. All she wants is to be free from the pain and able to lead a normal life with her family, friends and job. Her boss however, has a different view. Life with migraine is exhausting. The author Kirsten Wendt knows it all too well from her own experience. For years she has suffered from the attacks, which are so often understated and not taken seriously. Unimaginable that so many people study, go to work, raise children, and embellish the garden despite the severe pain. There's a lot of fake involved, because there's a cure, think those who don't suffer from migraine. In her enjoyable novel Kirsten Wendt depicts the daily routines and experiences of a migraine patient in all its facets partly cheerful, partly pensive, and sometimes depressed....When I phone the sedate neurologists office the receptionist tells me that I can't call just willy-nilly. I am too worn out and my head hurts too much to bear two hours sitting in the waiting room. The receptionist unnerves me. I just want to know, how long this depression will last, and if I could assume that the end effect is about zero, when I have a continuous migraine. Are you at risk of committing suicide? she asks me in all seriousness. Everybody knows that suicides don't ring the bells before they depart this life. Just to spite this twerp I say Yes and hang up. A moment later the phone rings, but I don't answer it. I am pleased a bit that she works up a sweat now, dials the number of my parents-in-law and even finds neighbors. Before everyone starts to panic I clarify the situation. The pills I throw into the trash bin...
